

Amsterdam joins the world's largest Hackathon for Climate Change

Is Saving the world from Climate Change impossible? We do not think so!

The Geeklist #hack4good 0.6 hackathon will take place 12-14 September, also in Amsterdam.

This September, leading up to the UN Climate Summit, the world's leading technologists, environmental organizations, NGOs, and governments are uniting in the world's biggest hackathon for Climate Change.

During the Geeklist #hack4good 0.6 hackathon over 3,000 passionate software engineers, designers, entrepreneurs and innovators unite online and in venues in 45+ cities around the world to build apps, products and technologies to solve climate and environment challenges facing the world, from climate awareness challenges to adaptation to action.

Challenges are being provided by organizations and field workers like: Fauna and Flora International, WWF, 350.org, UK Dept. of Energy & Climate Change, Friends of the Earth, WeForest, Save the Children, Project 1%, Lead International, World Resources Institute, along with participation from the USDA, US Office of the CTO, members of the United Nations and countless experienced field workers in climate change. The event is taking place in every time zone across 45 cities, made possible by Just Giving, Rackspace and countless local sponsors in every city.

Of course Amsterdam is joining this global initiative to build innovative solutions to climate change issues, with up to 100 hackers gathering together at Rockstart to contribute to the global movement and build projects to help address what many are calling humanity's greatest challenge.

The Geeklist Corps of Developers volunteers, led by global director Dan Cunningham, have united everyone here.

The Geeklist #hack4good mission is to create technology-based innovations to address and make a real-world impact on climate change and related issues.

What is Hack4good?

The Geeklist #hack4good series was established by Geeklist, the San Francisco social networking site for developers, to bring together a global community with a common purpose: to build and launch projects for social good.

Geeklist #hack4good is an international, multi-city hackathon movement that has taken the world by storm and set the bar for bringing together software engineers, hackers, ui/ux designers, product developers, founders, leader, thinkers, and civic minded organizations together to “hack” together for social good.

At the event, teams respond to problem statements and challenges set by NGOs, government organisations and subject matter experts, collaborating intensively over a 48-hour period. The result is 100s of prototype projects that demonstrate innovative technology solutions to have a positive impact for humanity.

In each location, a judging panel made up of technology leaders and subject matter experts will select the most promising teams in terms of their potential impact. These go forwards into global judging.

Geeklist and its partners work with teams to turn projects that start at the hackathons into long-term enterprises and enact sustainable positive impact in the world.

Previous events and impact

This is the sixth Geeklist #hack4good.

Previous events have produced more than 250 projects for social good, tackling a range of issues including disability, education, health, disaster response, animal rescue, deforestation, human trafficking and many more.

These now being taken forwards by NGOs including GOAL, Concern Worldwide, Medecins sans Frontieres, Greenpeace, Blind Relief Association and the Disaster Emergency Committee.
